2022

The onset of Covid-19 pandemic has shaken up the world drastically. The unprecedented times with all its uncertainties pushed the governments, policy makers, civil bodies, institutions, organizations etc. to cope with the situation with out of box thinking. It required different measures and the pandemic changed not only the style of working but also that of governance. The last 2 years have been a setback to the global economy and to the developmental goals set by the nations. Not only has it exacerbated poverty, unemployment, economic stagnation and the like, it has also accentuated the already existing inequalities in the society and exposed the vulnerabilities. The intersectionality of caste, class, gender have shown that the pandemic has affected different classes differently.

It has been widely accepted that post pandemic, the society is unlikely to return to pre-pandemic systems. The future of work (occupational transitions. WFH, emergence of gig economy, worker vulnerability etc.), rise and acceptance of digital behavior (telemedicine, remote working, changed delivery systems in social welfare, online education, video-conferencing etc.), temporary replacement of face-to-face interaction by virtual interaction, upsurge in de-globalization tendencies will all push the society to adapt to newer ways. According to UN SDGs

Report 2020 the Covid 19 crisis is reversing decades of progress on poverty, healthcare and education. The Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs), incorporating four pillars of development- human, social, natural and physical- will have a very important role to play in shaping of post-pandemic society. The SDGs encompass almost every aspect of human and planetary wellbeing. SDGs profess an inclusive approach in the implementation. 'No one should be left behind and No one should be left out' as the philosophy of SDGs will ensure that measures are taken to address the vulnerabilities highlighted by the pandemic. The need of the hour is to work on priority for universal health coverage, universal access to the digital world, universal access for digital education, work-life balance, migration, gender equity, affordable clean energy, ambitious climate actions, encouragement and inclusive policies for community actions etc.

The present conference aims to initiate dialogue on the challenges of a post-pandemic society and how SDGs can be aligned to deal with these challenges. The Conference will be in hybrid mode. Interested scholars can choose the mode of participation - online or offline .
